We plan to develop a variety of models of ethical judgment using this research. One of these models will be able to explain the effects of variations in reasoning ability and knowledge. We will also examine some aspects of how reasoning underlies moral judgment. We have learned that reasoning underlies many aspects of reasoning generally, and that reasoning in some areas is not required for a judgment to be made. That is, reasoning may be present without the capacity to analyze reasoning. In this research we will examine whether this is true of moral reasoning. We will investigate the nature of moral reasoning using a variety of reasoning tasks, and also the value judgments involved. We will examine the relationships between reasoning and knowledge by examining how the types of reasoning used in reasoning tasks are related to types of knowledge. We have learned that there are strong connections between reasoning and ethical judgment. We plan to examine the ways in which moral reasoning is related to moral judgment.The physical chemistry of protein folding and stability in vivo. The remarkable stability of a protein structure in the cell depends on the exquisite balance between native and misfolded conformers. Recent studies have shown that protein misfolding is a generic, vital aspect of cell homeostasis. This implies that cells harbor sophisticated, protein quality control systems to handle and eliminate misfold
